14:30 – Roundtable. State Capitalism: An Additional “Variety”?

Chair: Miklós Szanyi, Hungarian Academy of Sciences

The concept of Varieties of Capitalism has evolved over time from the original LME-CME distinction into a more nuanced analytical framework. After the 2008 crisis, the VoC approach achieved new momentum. New areas of analysis were added to the existing analytical framework (e.g., role of FDI and state intervention), and new regions and countries were included (e.g., large emerging market economies and most of all China). How far does the concept range? Is it a suitable toolkit for the analysis of (former) transition economies in CEE, the post-soviet area, and beyond? What have been the main reasons of international variations in applicability? Are there systemic differences among countries or country groups with regard to increased direct state intervention? How has the term been defined and understood differently by various authors, and what are the main characteristics of a potential theoretical model of state capitalism?
